Back-to-School Violence Prevention: The Red Zone

The Red Zone. It isn't a geographical place. It's actually a time period on college campuses--one during which up to 50% of acts of sexual violence on campuses are thought to occur. This is a period between campus move-in and the holiday break that correlates with an influx of new students. Perpetrators are thought to target those who are unfamiliar with campus and may be experiencing new social circles and activities. And because we know that sexual violence is the fault of the perpetrator, then one major way to address the red zone is by incorporating primary prevention strategies on campuses in an effort to change the culture at its roots.

This is a conversation that is unfortunately lacking on some campuses and their surrounding communities, as many databases such as RAINN and the Department of Justice have concluded that 23.1% of female undergrads, 21% of trans and gender non-conforming students, and 5.4% of male students still experience sexual assault on campus. We must do this prevention work at the community level, recognizing that a culturally pervasive issue will not suddenly go away after students attend one short lecture. Below, we've listed just a couple of resources to help you learn more about this issue and to incorporate this community-level prevention work on campuses and beyond:

- "Password: Consent - a Campaign to END the Red Zone" --a toolkit from Break the Cycle
- "Add 'Consent' to your Teen's College Checklist" --a conversation starter from the NSVRC
- "Be the One Ohio" --a primary prevention campaign from OAESV and the Ohio Department of Health
