

Erin's Law: Frequently Asked Questions+

I. What is Erin's Law?

Inspired by a survivor of child sexual abuse (CSA) and created with evidence-based practices, Erin's Law is legislation seeking state governments to require schools to:

- Provide age-appropriate sexual abuse prevention education to students,
- Train school personnel on child sexual abuse detection, and
- Inform parents and guardians of child sexual abuse warning signs

Implementation of Erin's Law varies from state to state, but the overall intention is to introduce prevention education programs to help students stay safe in K-12 schools.

II. Which states have passed Erin's Law?

Indiana, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia are among the 37 states that have already passed Erin's Law. Ohio and Kentucky remain outliers regionally in their delay in passing this critical legislation. Curriculum mandated by Erin's Law has spread throughout the nation since first appearing in schools in 2009.

III. Why is Erin's Law needed in Ohio?

In Ohio, no existing law requires prevention education for our vulnerable K-12 students. This gap in education is especially concerning when we consider that each year in Ohio, over 30,000 children are involved in a substantiated case of child abuse or neglect; of these, 5,000 are related to sexual abuse specifically<sup>1</sup>. The stark reality is that there are far more children suffering sexual abuse in Ohio; only 38% of child victims of sexual abuse disclose (at any point in their lifetime) the sexual abuse they experience<sup>2</sup>. This means that over half of child sexual abuse cases go unaddressed. Fear, when combined with a lack of support and education, can prevent children from coming forward to seek help. However, this is a problem that we can, and must, take action to solve together.

IV. What are the key education components for K-12 students?

The design of approved prevention education curricula varies from state to state. Most states that passed Erin’s Law engaged in a common practice - creating an implementation task force to recommend evidence-based prevention programs to school districts, with input from educators, preventionists, social workers, advocates, and other key stakeholders in the state from education, health, victim services, and child welfare agencies.

An analysis of the curriculums across Erin’s Law states demonstrates that the following prevention education topics are frequently recommended program topics implemented in Erin’s Law states, divided by age group:

Elementary School	Consent & Respect	Bodily Autonomy & Personal Body Safety	Seeking Help	Emotions, & Boundaries
Middle School	Consent	Healthy & Unhealthy Relationships	Seeking Help	Bullying & Abuse
High School	Communication & Consent	Healthy & Unhealthy Relationships	Seeking Help	Online/Technology Safety

V. How have other states implemented Erin’s Law?

Task Forces<sup>3</sup>

Many states’ versions of Erin’s Law have called for the creation of task forces to study the issue of CSA in their state and make recommendations for implementation. Task forces vary in size and makeup and typically meet for a period of one to three years. During this period of time, members of the task force convene with stakeholders throughout the state, conduct research on evidence-based practices and programs, and draft a report or other form of updated written guidance for schools and lawmakers.

Certain states have chosen to create a permanent statewide, multi-disciplinary task force to continuously engage with local communities and further establish local efforts for prevention (such as Nevada, Vermont, and more). Such task forces may serve as monitoring mechanisms as well by submitting annual reports on prevention programming and implementation progress by each school district and charter school.

Program recommendations

Programs include more than one session per year, provided on an annual basis

Research and best practices in other states have identified that four sessions of prevention education per year are ideal<sup>4</sup>. This allows concepts learned in the program to be reinforced throughout the school year. These sessions should be held annually to build on instruction from the previous year.

Developmentally appropriate instruction for each grade level

Under Erin's Law, students receive age and developmentally appropriate lessons designed for each grade level. Lessons should be based on evidence-based methods that have been proven to be effective for sexual abuse prevention.

Program delivery options should remain flexible

States have typically offered flexible options for program delivery, which allows a wide range of professionals to assist schools in providing prevention education. In states with a robust prevention education system, Erin's Law task forces recommend prevention agencies be contracted to provide and develop programs as necessary. In states with limited resources and without prior planning, administrators, school social workers, community educators, and teachers were responsible for presenting the education modules.

An evaluation component with measurable outcomes

All programs should incorporate evaluation methods into their efforts to prevent child sexual abuse. Different evaluation strategies are best suited to measure an individual program's intended outcomes, and should be informed by the children, families, and communities served. A competent evaluation strategy will measure the effectiveness of different programs to help schools and agencies continuously improve education for students.

Training component for school personnel

All school personnel are recommended to complete annual training modules to develop skills, knowledge, and capabilities related to CSA prevention education. These modules should focus on recognizing and responding to suspected abuse and neglect. Additionally, forming a multi-disciplinary response team to best respond to student disclosures has been highlighted as a best practice.

Services for child abuse victims

Competent mental health services for children who disclose sexual abuse are a crucial need. After implementing Erin's Law, an increase in student sexual abuse disclosures is expected and normal. School districts must be proactive in developing trauma informed reporting procedures, if they do not already exist.

Funding to prevention education

In current Erin's Law states, task forces and school districts have noted that successful implementation goes hand in hand with funding to support prevention efforts. A lack of funding, resources, and commitment hindered progress in Illinois in the three years after the Task Force issued its recommendations to schools<sup>5</sup>. Prevention funding for the State Rape Crisis Fund can contribute to successful implementation, as this will create more capacity for community rape crisis center preventionists to engage with local school districts in lieu of placing the burden solely on teachers and other school personnel.

VI. How will teachers and school personnel be impacted?

Continuing education will be a requirement for school employees, including but not limited to educators, administrators, and service personnel. Adults working with children should have thorough knowledge of child sexual abuse and be prepared to respond appropriately to disclosures of child sexual abuse.

A comprehensive effort in schools and communities will increase the efficacy of prevention programming. When all adults are familiar and knowledgeable with child safety topics, it helps to better protect children and professionals supporting children and families.

VII. What should parents expect?

Parents, caregivers, and families play a fundamental role in preventing violence and abuse. Erin's Law encourages parent participation to increase awareness of the skills taught in school so that they can reinforce the concepts at home. This helps both parents and children learn important concepts and prepares parents with how they talk to their children about preventing sexual abuse. Parents and guardians can also expect resources to recognize warning signs of child sexual abuse and needed assistance and referrals to support sexually abused children and their families.

State Implementation Highlight: West Virginia

West Virginia passed Erin's Law in 2015, and promptly formed a task force to conduct research and make recommendations for implementation and curriculum options. In January of 2018, the task force provided these recommendations in a report to the Governor which culminated in further legislation that would strengthen professional development requirements for school personnel for responding and preventing CSA and require schools to provide developmentally appropriate body safety information to all students beginning in 2019.

The task force collaborated closely with the West Virginia Department of Education, and developed a body safety toolkit for K-12 grades with lesson plans and supplementary materials. The West Virginia State Task Force Report can be accessed here.

State Implementation Highlight: Michigan

Michigan requires child sexual abuse prevention education for students and employees. In 2012, Michigan passed Public Act 594 of 2012, which requires that public school students in Grades Pre-K-5 receive age-appropriate, evidence-based curriculum and instruction on child sexual abuse awareness and prevention. School employees are required to receive training on child sexual abuse, including how to respond appropriately and supportively to disclosures of abuse. Parents and guardians are also to be provided with educational information on the warning signs of a child being sexually abused and information on needed assistance, referral or resources.
